OUR AMERICAN PIE.

In the face of a decided change in our dietary habits and of a decided effort of French pastries to supplant them, plain, old-fashioned, substantial them, plain, old-fashioned, substantial American pie still holds a strong place in the affections of many of us. Pie need not be indigestible, if it is properly made and properly cooked. The crust should be reasonably short and baked thoroughly, so that there is no suggestion of sogginess. And the filling should be wholesome. Of course, even when made in the most careful and approved manner, pie is not preeminently a simple or easily digested dessert. It is hardly a food to be given to children. But it is not impossible of digestion and it is dellcious.

There are, of course, many different ways of making ple crust and probably each has its good points. Choose one that calls for little handling of the crust. Use pastry flour if it is called for, or other good flour with a teaspoonful of baking powder for about a quart of flour. Use very cold water, very cold shortening, and work quickly. Cut the shortening into the flour with a sliver knife and fork or two knives. Some good cooks use the tips of the fingers. But as the crust in the making must be kept cold to be crispand as the fingers are almost sure to become warm, the fork and knives are, perhaps, best.

Use shortening and flour in the proportions of about three-quarters of a cupful of flour. About half a cupful of cold water will be needed for this amount.

and a cup of fresh grated cocoanut. with clean cold water and a soft cloth.

Add last a teaspoonful of lemon juice— this may be omitted—and pour the cus-tard mixture into a ple plate lined with rich crust. Bake slowly in a moderate oven until done.

There are many things that can be made with plain pie crust besides pies. There are tarts, for instance. To make these, bake the crust in little shells of in flat disks, and pile jam of any desired sort on these.

Then there are baked apple dump-lings. For these, cut large squares of the crust and in each put an apple, peeled, cored and steamed until just tender. Fill the core cavity with sugar, spices and butter and pull up the four corners. Pinch them together at the top and bake until brown.
